The Future King of England. Albert Edward, Prince of Wales, attained his fortieth tirthday the first week of Novembar. The Prince, it is well knows, is a true chip of the c'd blec's. For a time his excesses not only argered the Queen, but alienated the affections of the amiable Alexandra, his wife, On the publication of one of the mist outspiken of the Price's scandals she gathered her obildren about her and determined to go to her father, the King of Denmark. The Prince dared not approach her, for he had no expuse to offer. His liaison was open, persistent, flagrant. In this dilomma Gladstone intervened. The young temptress was removed from Landon. The soundal was hushed. The Quien was in duced to receive the mature scapegrace, and the Princess, frightened by the fac: that she could not take her children with her, submis-sively received the prodigal. But what is born in the bone must come out in the flish. Bar. ly had the peace been patched up when the olubs - pest-houses of tattle and the first to gather in the straws of seandal-began to whisper the sensational details of a threatened rupture in high life. One unfortunate journel went so far, indeed, as to give the names, and well it might, for the writer had seen the applicution for divorce filed at Somerset House. The names were given in full-Mr. Lungtry, Corrwallis West, with the Prires of Wales and the wicked toapegrace, Lord Londale, as co-ret-pondents. No sooner had this startling bit of scandal reached print than certain powerful inflaceces were brought to bear and the records were cleared of every vestige of the action. Then a libel suit was instituted against the journal publishing the fact, and, thanks to the truckling subserviency of a British court and a British jury, the unhappy editor was sentenced to an enermous fine and a year or more in prison. The Princs is as much George IV as George IV was like any one of a dezen of his stingy, ignorant, winc-bibbing, woman-debauching progeniture, the boxgarly Dakes of Hanover, of the House of Celle. Io one instance Albert Edward met his match. It was in the summer of 1877. A young American girl of rare beauty had just made her appearance in London. At a West Ead breakfast party she was placed near the British Sardscapelus. Every-body remarked during the meal that the Prices had eyes only for the bewitching Ameiican. He commanded the hostess to present the lady. She astonished him by treating tim just as she treated any other gentleman. The Prince, accustomed to have all womankind flog themselves at him, was incredulous. The young woman cauldn't have understood his rank. She must have confused him with some one else. He offered the young girl his arm. She took it without a particle of elation, hesitation, or embarrassment. With the intention the second control of the control of my hair ; I can't carry them, because my hands are otherwise full. You will have to take them to some one elso." The Prince was astoniabed at such perversity. Here was a girl actually returning him what he knew any woman in the house or garden would have cherished and kissed and wept over in transports as a souvenier of royalty. At many other social festivities it was remarked during the succeeding weeks that the Prince would always be found at those in which the American was known to be invited. To several she had been invited, as was intimated to her by command of the Prince. These she refused under verious pretexts. The Prince became more mystified and enamored than ever. One day at a breakfast party at Lady Waldegrave's the heir to the throne informed the young lady that he would do himself the pleasure of calling on her the next morning. The day passed, however, and he didn't come. About six o'clock a coupe drove up and the Prince, unattended, entered the hotel and sent hir oard up to the American. He was invited up and remarked on entering that he had made bold to come at tea time hoping to be asked to join. He was asked. He was all gaiety and condescension. He prattled about America and the Americans, and suggested that the "Princess would be charmed to see Miss - at Sandringham Palace. Tea being ready, the Pcinco arcso with alacrity. His countenance fall, however, when entering the lunc'-room, [as they are called in small Eoglish hotels, I stall young gentlemen was waiting. The young girl, with a mischicyous twinkle, merely said: "Your Reyal Highness, my brother." The Prices didn't even look at the gentleman. He was constrained and al most awkward during the tes, which must not he confused with an American supper. The English upper classes serve tea an hour or more before dinner, sometimes by passing it around but more generally in the breakfast-room or lugob-room. At this tea there is very thin toast, with, perhaps, marmalade or "jam."

The Prince's ill-humor, not to say his rage, may be better understood when it is borne in mind that when royalty makes a visit the person visited is no longer master or mistress of member is permitted to be present save the person upon whom royalty has put such an honor as a personal visit. Hence the obstinate intrusion of the brother was doubly irritating to the imperial and royal Loyslace. Rising from the table, he waited for the lady to pass into the drawing-room, clearly indicating by ignoring pointedly the young man that his presence was no longer desired. But the lady, as she reached the threshold, turned and seeing the brother evidently irresolute said, gaily : "Come, Fred, perhaps the Prices will join in our American game, three-handed." Here sgain was an curage upon reyal initiative. No private person may enter an apartment in which royalty is, without a special command; once entered, he may not open his mouth unless by reyal condescension. But swallowing he declined the game glod-humoredly, and secing the brother a fixture, presently departed. The Prices made no proposition to visit the young lady again, but a fortnight after his first rebuff, the lady had finished dinner when the card of "His Royal Highness" was handed to her. She bade him to be shown into the drawing room, where, on arriving, the importunate woper was visibly disconcented to find the brother prepared for a tete---:ete. The royal petulacos and uncaccialed annoyones had no effect upon his host. Though he made every conceivable hist that he didn't desire a third person present the voung lady was obtuse, and in an hour the built d suiter revised, as usual not even bowing to the brother. He tried twice afterward to surprise the lady unguarded, but the brother had but one mission. the protection of his sister, and the Prince finally gave up this persistent love chase, the first, according to London gossip, in which he had been wholly defeated, for he did not even succeed in attaching a scandal to the girl's name.
